

PEEK, Split-Attention, and Entry Design

Use this section to design how attention enters the room and what might quietly steal it.

Opening Entry

22. What PEEK type will you use first: curiosity, challenge, connection, humor, visual shock, or something else?

We will use humor for our story to make the most engaging
And fun as possible

23. Describe the specific opening. What does the learner see, feel, hear, or do in the first 5 minutes?

The description of the fridge, it is scary and biologically
A hazard. It is a story that will start off serious but then will Become funny

24. What emotional or cognitive state are you trying to create?

Im trying to make the people feel a sense of humor

Split-Attention Audit

25. List the biggest split-attention risks in your environment: screens, tabs, clutter, stress, tone, unclear direction, hunger, embarrassment, or something else.

The way the story will interact with the website.

26. What can you remove, soften, simplify, or sequence differently to reduce those leaks?

visual elements that can directly interact with the story

Screens and Re-entry

27. Where is screen use truly useful here, and where might low-tech or no-tech create better presence?

The story will always be there, but having visual elements
Can make it more entertaining

28. How will you re-open attention at the midpoint when energy naturally drops?

When mr clean is introduced and how he is the main hero
He is in search of the Arm and Hammer

29. How will you open the final, hardest section so the learner leans in instead of bracing away?

It will be the conclusion of the story but it will also have
The climax of the situation where Mr clean finds the arm
And hammer to defeat this evil fridge.
